Glimpses of Campus Interview

Safety First

This time, safety first includes discussion on Fluid flow through a pipe, color code and its safety aspect. It is typically indicated by color coding the pipe or the fluid itself. The most common color-coding system used in industry is the ANSI/ASME A13.1 standard, which assigns specific colors to different types of fluids.

The ANSI/ASME A13.1 standard is a widely used pipe color coding system in industry, which assigns specific colors to different types of fluids flows through pipe. Here is a list of some common fluid types and their corresponding color codes as per ANSI/ASME A13.1 standard:

Fluid Type	Color Code
Air	Black
Water	Blue
Steam	Red
Hot Water	Red
Natural Gas	Orange
Oil	Yellow
Fuel Gas	Yellow
Chemical	Green
Cryogenic	Purple

This standard identifies the color of the labels and what those colors mean. The following are the main options for this set of standards:

- Yellow with Black Lettering - This option is used for any pipe that contains flammable and oxidizing liquids and gases. This could include gasoline, oils, and many others.
- Green with White Lettering - Using a green label with white lettering means that the pipe contains potable water. It could be used for cooling, feeding boilers, or even going to drinking fountains or sinks.
- Blue with White Lettering - Blue labels with white lettering are used for pipes that transport compressed air.
- Red with White Lettering - Red labels with white lettering is used for all fire quenching fluids. This could include water, but only if the pipe is used just for fire quenching.

- Orange with Black Lettering - Orange labels with black lettering are for toxic or corrosive fluids. Most acids will need to use this type of pipe marking.
- Brown with White Lettering - This option is for all combustible fluids.

The ANSI/ASME color codes for pipes also leave several color combinations for "user defined" pipes. This is important because it allows facilities to plan out certain pipes that don't fit in with the normal standards. The user defined color options are:

- Purple with White Lettering
- White with Black Lettering
- Gray with White Lettering
- Black with White Lettering

It is prepared by students of the Mechanical Engineering Department named Kerai Pragnesh (206210319009) and Makwana Shyam Sureshbhai (206210319028). Mr. Divyanshu Lokwani, LME guided them for preparing the report.
